Appreciate the value of employees as human capital

Evolution of Human Resource

- The term “human resource management” is a recent term - from the 1980s onwards.
- During ancient times and for a long period in the medieval era, production of goods was done mainly by skilled people and craftsmen.
- They themselves owned the tools and instruments.
- They managed their jobs themselves with the support of their families therefore there was not a need for employee-employer relationships.
- However many people who could afford it hired people to help them do the work called apprentices.

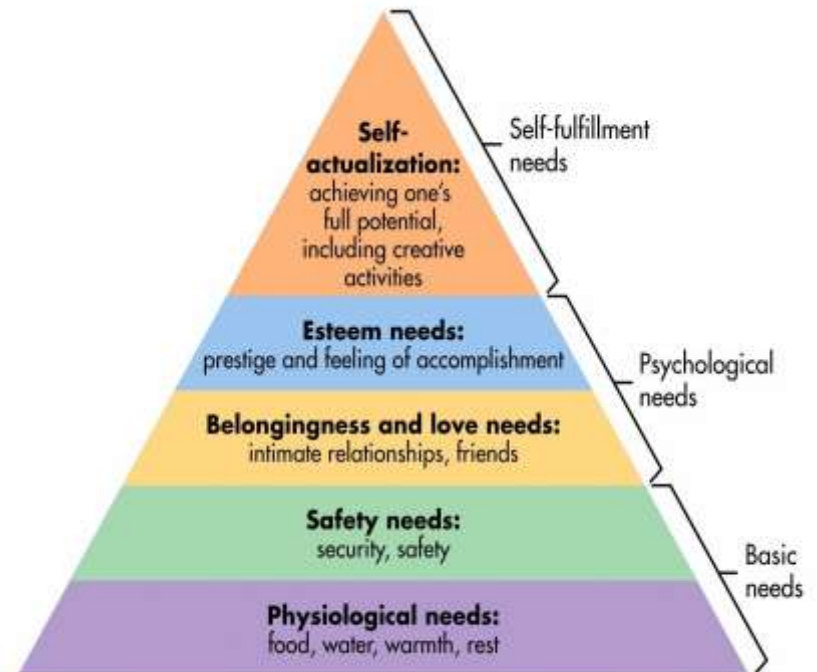

Elements of contemporary HRM can be traced back to the human relations movement of the 1930s

& The discovery of the social needs of workers,

Also the developments in the body of knowledge associated with job satisfaction, motivation and leadership in the 1950s

1960s in pursuit of increased human performance at work.

Personnel Management vs. HRM

Different needs and concerns over time have added 'layers' to HRM activity

- Personnel management

Little focus on broader business links, overly concentrated on activities of personnel professionals, low-level record keeping and 'people maintenance' function

- HRM

More concerned with business strategies, and linkages with HR strategy, considers HR as the most important organisational resource.

PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

- Coordinates functions of the personnel program.
- Involves a functional approach
- Emphasizes behaviour and interpersonal relations.
- Success judged by results achieved through functions of the personnel program.

HUMAN RESOURCES MANAGEMENT

- Coordinates personnel management with organization planning.
- Involves a system approach.
- Emphasizes environments and issues.
- Success judged by contributions to cost reductions and profit growth or service objectives.

|--------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------|
| Time and planning perspective  | Short term, reactive, ad hoc, marginal                      | Long term, proactive, strategic, integrated  |
| Psychological contract         | Compliance                                                  | Commitment                                   |
| Control systems                | External controls                                           | Self-control                                 |
| Employee relations perspective | Pluralist, collective, low trust                            | Unitarist, individual, high trust            |
| Preferred structures/systems   | Bureaucratic/mechanistic, centralised, formal defined roles | Organic, devolved, flexible roles            |
| Roles                          | Specialist/professional                                     | Largely integrated into line management      |
| Evaluation criteria            | Cost minimisation                                           | Maximum utilisation (human asset accounting) |

The management process

The management process is increasingly complex as the result of:

- Specialisation in roles and therefore skills needed to fill them.
- Competition between organisations for talent.
- A requirement for more sophisticated methods to recruit, deploy and retain talent.
- Increased regulation and employment law.
- The international nature of modern employment.

(Torrington et al. 2017)

The management process continued..

- In the past, looking after people-related issues was the province of specialists – in personnel
- Currently: industrial relations – working on basic issues of recruitment, reward, working conditions, etc.
- But it is becoming a critical concern for operations management.

The management process continued..

- “... More than 30 studies carried out in the UK and US since the early 1990s reveals:
- That there is a correlation between people management and business performance.

That this relationship is positive, and that it is cumulative:

- The more effective the practices, the better the result ...”

‘HRM includes anything and everything associated with the management of employment relationships in the firm.

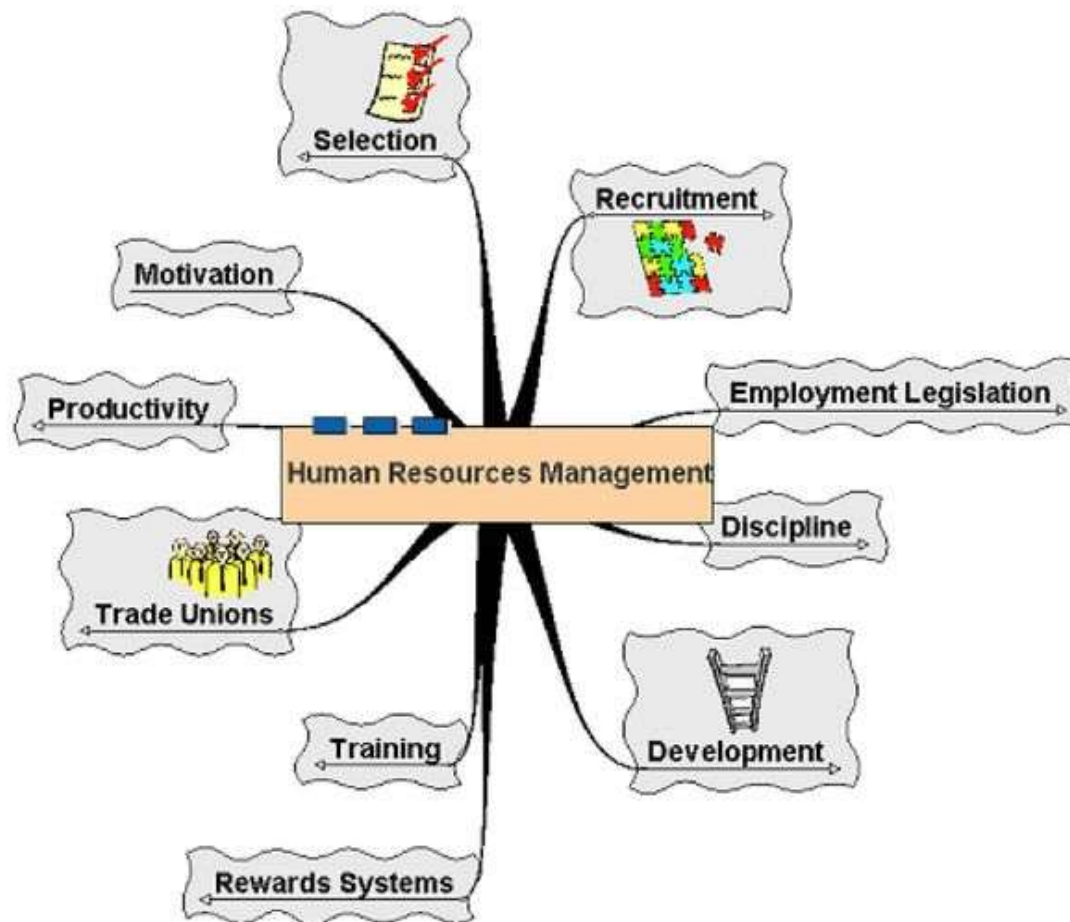

We do not associate HRM solely with a high-commitment model of labour management or with any particular ideology or style of management’

(Boxall and Purcell, 2000: 184)

HRM is a particular approach and philosophy to the tasks of managing people

- It is essentially resource centred, not workforce centred.
- It identifies with the needs and interests of organisational management.
- It focuses on organisational demands and deployment to meet those demands.
- It emphasises planning, monitoring and controlling.
