Module Overview

CMI Learning Outcomes (applies ONLY to qualifying students)

This module has been mapped to CMI 516 - Planning, procuring and managing resources

- CMI Learning Outcomes:

1. Understand the importance of effective and efficient resource use in organisations
2. Know how to plan resources to meet organisational objectives
3. Know how to procure resources
4. Know how to monitor resource use in organisations

Upon successful completion of the module and degree programme students may be considered for an additional professional qualification – Level 5 CMI Diploma in Management and Leadership providing the professional standards are met.

It is expected that students use CMI resources throughout the degree programme, especially, modules that are CMI linked.

CMI Disclaimer

Please note that the CMI Level 5 qualification is ONLY applicable to those students who were registered with the Chartered Management Institute (CMI) before January 2026. Any students enrolled after January 2026 will NOT be eligible for the CMI award.

Module aim and summary

- This module offers students a critical overview of the theories and debates regarding how organisations manage their resources.
- This module will focus on the range of resources that are used by an organisation to achieve its aims and objectives.
- These could be time, money, equipment and human resources.

Module aim and summary (cont'd)

- This module is designed to raise the students' understanding of the resource management issues within contemporary organisations.
- The module will introduce the key principles of human resource management (HRM) focusing upon:
 1. The core areas of recruitment &
 2. selection, through performance management, to release of individuals from the organisation.

Module aim and summary (cont'd)

- Students will consider how organisations identify and plan the resources they need.
- And how they manage the supply, continuity and quality of them to achieve aims and objectives.
- There will be consideration of how to monitor use of such resources and how disruption to their supply can be managed.

Introduction to resource management

What is Resource Management?

Resource management involves planning, scheduling, and allocating people, money, and technology within a particular team/project/program or organisation.

It is the process of allocating resources to achieve the greatest value to the organisation.

Who do you think does this?

The Importance of Effective and Efficient resource use in organisations

- Effective and efficient resource use, supports organisations to achieve their goals, however processes need to be in place to ensure the resources selected are not only fit for purpose, but also provide the best value for money.
- Management is about getting things done using the organisational resources such as people, equipment and materials.
- Managers are responsible for: the process of planning, organising, leading and controlling the efforts of organization members &
- Using all organisational resources to achieve stated organisational goals.

Mescon, Albert and Khedouri (1985)

Efficient or Effective?

- We use efficient to describe something or someone that works in an organised way:

The new online banking system offers a convenient and efficient way to check your account. I have always known James to be highly competent and efficient in all aspects of his job.

- We use effective to describe something that gives you the results you want:

Taking this tablet is a very effective cure for travel sickness. In this light, the camera is more effective if you use the flash.

Class discussion

1. What is HR?
2. Activities and responsibilities?

Common HR activities –this topic will be covered in more detail this week.

Can you think of some contemporary HRM issues? Refer to the MS Word document on Aula – “Contemporary Issues in HRM” – what can you tell the rest of the class about some of the issues listed?

Apply your thinking:

- What could Heathrow have done better?

WINDOW ON PRACTICE

In 2008, twenty-five years after it was first planned, Terminal Five at Heathrow Airport in London finally opened its doors to passengers. The total cost of the building was £4.3 billion. The new terminal was exclusively for the use of British Airways who had been planning for several years to move all its existing operations from the various other terminals at Heathrow into Terminal Five and had gone so far as to contribute £330 million to its flamboyant interior design. The day before the opening an article in the Financial Times reported executives' concerns that the look of the place would raise expectations too high, but that it was 'beyond imagination to contemplate failure' (Blitz, 2008). Yet spectacular failure was what followed.

In the first few days of operation over 300 flights scheduled to depart from Terminal Five were cancelled, very long queues formed at check-in and transfer desks, while some 28,000 passengers found themselves separated from their luggage. The immediate cost to British Airways was £16 million, but the long-term direct costs were authoritatively estimated to be around £150 million (BBC 2008a) let alone vast further losses resulting from a deterioration in the airline's already poor brand image.

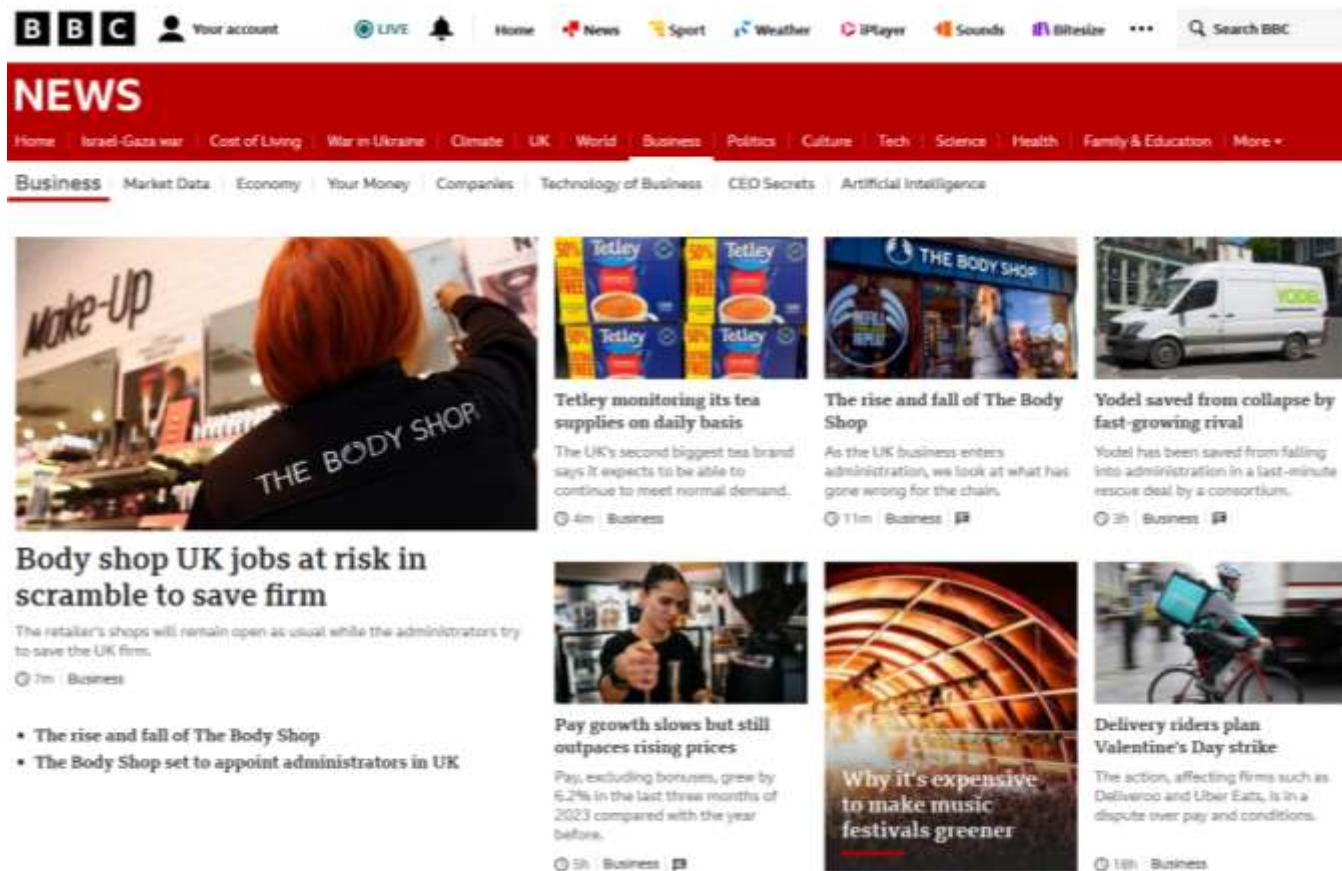

And why did this debacle happen? It appears that the major reason was simply extraordinarily poor management of people. The major immediate problem arose because the staff were not properly trained to use the equipment at Terminal Five and were unprepared when it came to solving the technical 'glitches' that quickly appeared once the baggage handling machinery started operating. In addition, long delays were caused on the first day as a result of staff being unable to find the staff car park or get through security screening on schedule. Later on, as flights began to arrive, staff simply failed to 'remove luggage quickly enough at the final unloading stage' (BBC 2008b).

Matters were not helped by the persistence over a long period of very poor employment relationships at British Airways. Done and Wilman (2008) reported that the failure of the airline to solve this fundamental problem was the real underlying cause of the Terminal Five debacle. An unnamed Heathrow executive said that they had all been expecting an outbreak of 'fuckem disease' as the new terminal opened and some staff simply decided 'not to work very hard'. British Airways' staff were neither committed to the success of the operation nor to their employer. Goodwill was in short supply leading staff to be intransigent and uncooperative when effort, positive enthusiasm and flexibility were what was required.
